

Anja Garbarek - Smiling & Waving (2001)

Written by bluesever

Sunday, 28 February 2010 21:47 - Last Updated Friday, 18 July 2014 12:10

Anja Garbarek - Smiling & Waving (2001)

01. Her Room
02. The Gown
03. Spin The Context
04. Stay Tuned
05. You Know
06. Big Mouth
07. The Diver
08. That's All
09. And Then
10. It Seems We Talk

- Anja Garbarek/ vocals, percussion - The London Session Orchestra / strings (tracks 1, 4, 5, 8, 9) - Laurence Pendrous / piano (tracks 1, 2, 7, 8), organ (track 4), Rhodes (track 6) - Chris Lawrence / bass (tracks 1-3, 6, 7, 9) - John Pigneguy, Richard Bissill / French horn (track 1) - Steve Jansen / percussion (tracks 1, 2), drums (tracks 3, 4) - John Bradbury, Ivo van der Werff, Tony Lewis, Tony Hinnegan / strings (tracks 2, 7) - Mark Hollis / piano, electric bass, melodica (track 2) - Melinda Maxwell / oboe (tracks 2, 7) - Steven Wilson / guitar (tracks 2, 5, 10), percussion (track 3), piano (track 10) - Martin Ditcham / percussion (tracks 2, 7) - Nick Bucknall, Anthony Pike / clarinet (track 3) - Tony Pleeth, Paul Kegg / cello - Richard Barbieri / analogue effects (track 4) - Jørgen Knudsen / atmosphere (track 4) - Robin O'Neill / bassoon (track 5) - Theo Travis / saxophone (track 6), flute (track 8), bass flute (track 10) - Gavyn Wright / violin (track 6) - Peter Lake / viola (track 6) - Robert Wyatt / vocals (track 7) - Helen Tunstall / harp (track 9) - Frank Ricotti / vibraphone (track 10)

Anja Garbarek's third album -- and her first for a major label -- is a departure from her previous efforts in that she's enlisted the help of musicians who understand how to blend her electronic textures with more organic instrumentation. The daughter of ECM jazz saxophone legend Jan Garbarek, Anja has moved far from the distorted soundscapes of her debut, the elegantly weird Balloon Mood from 1996. Here she employs the talents and tactics of musicians such as Mark Hollis (formerly of Talk Talk), Richard Barbieri and Steve Jansen from Japan and Rain Tree

Anja Garbarek - Smiling & Waving (2001)

Written by bluesever

Sunday, 28 February 2010 21:47 - Last Updated Friday, 18 July 2014 12:10

Crow, respectively, and the production savvy of Steve Wilson from Porcupine Tree. Her sound is all but impossible to describe, but there are moments where the wispy, almost invisible vocal style of Stina Nordenstam echoes in the mix, as she does the lyrical irony of Laurie Anderson, and the broken poetic phrasing of Bjork. But this is no comparison, as shades and specters of different music such as jazz, classical, rock, trip-hop, and even dub waft through this airy mix, through all of them appear as ghosts, musics that are what we remember them as, from some near future emptiness, rather than as current constructs from which to make music from. There is the notion of observance, Garbarek is always the outsider, witnessing small occurrences in everyday life and reading who knows what into them. There is a duet with Robert Wyatt, entitled "The Diver," where besides a double bass -- present in every track -- there is little but a spare, lilting piano, some string, and an oboe. The pair's voices comment on witnessing the art of a diver's plunge. Their voices entwine and then separate, creating a view both from pool side and in Wyatt's case, distance. The up-beat trip-hop of "That's All," where drum loops engage a chamber group with bass; a flute slips and slides along underneath the listener like a ball rolling under the couch, almost moving by you before it can be grasped: "And he crawls to the door in a warm nurse/where he walks for the first time/surrounded by the dry clouds/he is leaving a trail/that's all we know." The next piece, the melancholy, "And Then," with nothing but a bass, the London Session Orchestra, and harpist Helen Turnstall, is at once a song of absence and arrival: "Unpack moments/the girl in the redcoat turns/passing. Entering. Going places/bring her name under the chain of lights/kneeling down/she throws herself into sound/passing. Entering. Going places..." In the broken lyric and shimmering instrumental quality we hear an artist emerging from her influences into a music of her own creation, shedding the pop influences of her past; in the process she is unearthing a signature music which turns in on itself before slowly opening to the listener in mysterious and wonderful ways. Smiling & Waving is an opaque, sensual gem. ---Thom Jurek, Rovi download: uploaded yandex 4shared mediafire solidfiles mega zalivalka filecloudio

anonfiles
oboom

back