

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

In 1960, Carol King was the music-writing half of a budding songwriting team which also included her lyric-writing husband Gerry Goffin. When they got the opportunity to write a song for up-and-coming girl group The Shirelles, they responded with "Will You Love Me Tomorrow," a pop masterpiece that topped the charts in 1961, the first #1 in history by a girl group and the first major success for the Goffin/King duo. Goffin and King started out as Brill Building-scene writers, working for impresario Don Kirshner at his Aldon company. As the story goes, Kirshner recognized the song's potential immediately, handing over a 10,000 dollar advance to each of the writers upon being presented with the demo. This was huge money to the struggling couple, who until then had none of their songs recorded.

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Amazingly, Carole King was only 18 when she wrote the song. She recorded a version herself later, sounding like a hesitant older woman, which simply doesn't work. It joins the long list of songs whose cover versions were better than the composer's own. The Shirelles had several other hits, including Mama Said, Soldier Boy, Baby It's You, and Dedicated to the One I Love. But nothing conveyed the same sad, plangent raw emotion as Will You Love Me ...

Carol King & Gerry Goffin (1959)

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

The Shirelles grew up in Passaic, New Jersey. Inspired by other girl groups, such as the Chantels (“Maybe) and the Bobettes (“Mr. Lee”), they started to write songs and sing together while still in high school. In 1958, the Shirelles recorded their ode to a week-long romance, called “I Met Him on a Sunday,” and made the pop charts at #49. The next release, written by lead singer Shirley Owens and called “Tonight’s the Night,” reached #39. “Will You Love Me Tomorrow” followed, and it rose straight to the top of the charts and remained at #1 for two weeks.

The Shireless

It is impossible to imagine a better anthem to kick off what became known as “the girl group” sound. The title poses a universal question endemic to all women, particularly to teenagers. The pre-coital time frame of the lyric is, to say the least, provocative. The song accurately portrays that maddeningly exciting, but frighteningly poignant moment. As such, “Will You Love Me Tomorrow” was the salvo shot that signaled the arrival of a feminine perspective in rock-and-roll music.

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

The Shireless - Will You Love Me Tomorrow

Goffin's lyrics deftly touch on the doubt that lurks behind all new romances. As sung by Shirelles' leader Shirley Owens in unflappable manner, the song doesn't skimp on the wonder inherent in any fresh coupling. But it's also unflinchingly realistic about the possibility that the fairy dust will dissolve at dawn.

Gerry Goffin

"Can I believe the magic in your sighs?" Owens pointedly asks her paramour. In the bridge, Goffin's words flow like champagne even as they fear the possible hangover:

"Tonight with words unspoken/You'll say that I'm the only one/But will my heart be broken/When the night meets the morning sun."

King's melody plays a big role in the overall effect, arching high in the verses and middle eight while accompanied by strings that elegantly trip across the proceedings like moonlight dancers, before coming back down to Earth for the interrogative refrain.

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

Don Kirshner

Born in 1942 in Brooklyn, Carol King grew up listening to the first wave of rock 'n' roll to hit mass audiences in America. Her earliest songs reflected a pop-rock sensibility geared to a white teen market. At Queens College in Brooklyn, where she trained to be a teacher, she met Gerry Goffin, with whom she would form one of the most successful songwriting teams of the '60s (classmates included Paul Simon and Neil Diamond). A trained chemist, Goffin wrote lyrics to accompany King's deceptively complex arrangements.

Carol King

Before "Will You Love Me Tomorrow," Goffin and King wrote more than four dozen songs that were never recorded. They lived in a basement apartment in New York City, and when King finished her secretarial day job and Goffin finished his chemist job, they'd sit in a tiny office belonging to Don Kirshner at Aldon Music and toil over songs.

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

Brill Building, NYC

Goffin and King came from an era when performers rarely wrote their own material but relied heavily on songwriters to provide them with hit singles. The most famous factory for this songwriting talent in the '50s and '60s was New York's Brill Building. In Rolling Stone, Jon Landau wrote: "The songs of Goffin and King are superb examples of the songwriting craft of the '60s. Finely honed to meet the demands of the clients who commissioned them, and written with the requirements of AM radio always firmly in mind, they still managed to express themselves in a rich way. Like Hollywood directors who learned how to make the limitations of the system work for them and in the process created something of their own pop vision."

Carol King

King released her first solo album in 1970. "Writer" was an example of King's growing musical maturity. With dense, layered piano chords, the songs were far removed from her teen pop ditties of the '60s. King's best work was not with a group of musicians, but when she was simply accompanying herself on piano. "I knew that her demos were more popular than her first two records," legendary producer Lou Adler told Rolling Stone.

Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow?

Written by bluelover

Wednesday, 13 January 2016 19:46 -

62nd Annual Grammy Awards, 1990, Best Female Pop Vocal Performance, Billie Jean King, 1990

62nd Annual Grammy Awards, 1990, Best Female Pop Vocal Performance, Billie Jean King, 1990

62nd Annual Grammy Awards, 1990, Best Female Pop Vocal Performance, Billie Jean King, 1990

62nd Annual Grammy Awards, 1990, Best Female Pop Vocal Performance, Billie Jean King, 1990

will you still love me tomorrow?