This is emphatically not run-of-the-mill, dreary or clockwork Baroque. It is heartfelt music of the highest order, music which has been inexplicably forgotten. A younger contemporary of Bach's, working to the east in Silesia, Gebel lived and composed in the same musical and cultural world. The compositional Baroque in Europe clearly stretched from Portugal and Ireland at least as far as Silesia, if we take Teixeira, Handel and now Gebel as boundary markers.

Because the Passion text is so familiar, the listener is continually comparing the setting to others, notably to the Bach St John. This work is in the same class as JSB's. Gebel uses similar resources and works in a style that could be mistaken for Bach's. If occasionally the artistic choices of the composer seem starker than Bach's, such as in the dramatic proclamation "Jesus von Nazareth, der Jüden König", it points up how open baroque music was to the distinctive and personal imprint of a compositional master. The mood of the work is generally like Bach's, drawing on the same tradition of chorale settings and reflective or commenting arias.

In this recording, the musicianship is of the highest order from chorus, instrumentalists and soloists. Everyone interested in music of this period would do well to hear it. To ensure that Gebel does not subside again into obscurity, record companies and conductors should issue other recordings of the work and help give life to a rediscovered master. It also deserves concert performances. The great pity is that it appears that the vast bulk of Gebel's work has been lost over the centuries. ---Zelenka

The St John Passion recorded here is known to have been performed in Rudolstadt in 1748. It consists of 6 Actus to be performed as a kind of meditations during the evening services held from Monday to Saturday during Holy Week. But the first version probably dates from Gebel's time in Dresden. The remark in the manuscript at the end of Actus 'Conclusion Before the Sermon' suggests that this version was in two parts, the first of which to be performed before, the second after the sermon. This is a practice we know from Leipzig when Johann Sebastian Bach composed his Passions.

In more than one respect this Passion belongs to two worlds, both textually and musically. On the one hand there are some aspects which are old-fashioned, and are rooted in the world of J.S. Bach. On the other hand there are traces of the new style which became fashionable from the 1730s onwards. In a time when many composers turned to the libretto by Barthold Heinrich Brockes, 'Der fr die Snde der Welt gemarterte und sterbende Jesus', Gebel by choice or because he was asked to do so composed a traditional oratorio passion, in which the text of the Gospel St John, Chapters 18 and 19 is the backbone. Like Bach he added arias on free texts the author of which is unknown yet and a number of chorales.
